The location of RA

- In most MEDC cities the highest residential densities are found in inner-city areas associated with terraced housing from the 19th century
- Usually, residential density in the city centre is low due to high land values
- With increasing distance from the city centre, residential density decreases (this reflects the greater availability of land use in the suburbs)

- Poorer households are located in the inner city, close to jobs, whereas high-quality housing is located further out
- Densities in suburban areas have increased over the last 30 years due to decentralization and the development of edge-of-town estates.
